Hoda, Aadam, Bilal, Sora, & Mohamad used to live comfortably in their home in, As Salamiyah, the Syrian city in the Hama governorate. A recent attack has left the family with no choice but to become displaced within their own country. The only question now is where can they turn to?

"Our neighbor's house was completely destroyed and ours was very badly damaged.

I was so afraid. I had to run out of the house. At 5am that morning, I left with my children"

HUMAN TARGETS

DATA

You move to an area that has a high density of other internally displaced people.

This seems hopeful at first, until you realize that you have become the target of your own government. Since 2011, most all IDP displacement locations have been targeted or hit by regime violence and air strikes. Duoma, a neighborhood in Damascus,for instance, became a hot spot that was targeted as a result of the presence of IDPs and protesters. And in 2014, 40 percent of IDPs in need of shelter and assistance were living in the Alepo governorate which has since been hard hit by the conflict.

SEARCHING FOR SHELTER

DATA

You try to move in with relatives in Homs.

But when the town is dismantled by airstrikes you realize you need to seek alternative shelter. The majority of IDPs stay with relatives, but more than 173,000 have since had to flee to public shelters. Inside Syria's borders there are about 8 official shelter camps and 25 provisional sites along the Turkish border (collective centers, schools, mosques, sports facilities) but with the massive amounts other IDPs coming to the border daily despite terrible conditions you soon realize that the only home for you now is a makeshift shelter in the shell of a half-built five story apartment block. Building materials are scattered around like toys; large holes in the walls offer no safety against the drop to the earth below.
